

What if the tradition is wrong?

For seventeen centuries, the church has placed the crucifixion on a Friday. But Friday gives you two nights in the tomb — not three. It leaves you with a spice-buying sequence that contradicts itself. And it breaks the one sign Jesus Himself gave to prove who He was.

This book doesn't start with tradition. It starts with the text.

Following the time markers that Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John actually wrote — “the next day,” “after two days,” “six days before the Passover” — a different week emerges. A week where two independent Gospel chronologies converge on the same day. A week where every authority in Israel examines Jesus and finds no fault. A week where the Lamb of God dies on the exact day, at the exact hour, that God commanded the Passover lamb to be killed fifteen centuries earlier.

This is not a commentary. It is not a denominational position. It is a guided walk through the text itself — every conclusion shown, every assumption identified, every inference labeled honestly. No verse is asked to carry more weight than it can bear.

You will not be asked to take anyone's word for it. You will be asked to open your Bible.

The tradition is old. But the text is older.
